Complementing the mosaics are the collection's impressive murals, some of which still bear the vibrant pigments of their original creation. These murals, often found in the public spaces and homes of Roman cities, depict historical events, portraits of influential figures, and scenes from Roman mythology. Through these artworks, we gain insights into the political, social, and religious aspects of Roman life.

From Busts to Statues: The Art of Roman Sculpture

The Roman Collection also boasts a remarkable array of sculptures, from small busts to larger-than-life statues. These works, carved from marble, bronze, and other materials, showcase the extraordinary skill and realism achieved by Roman sculptors. The collection includes portraits of emperors, gods, and ordinary citizens, each capturing the unique character and expressions of its subjects. One particularly notable piece is a marble bust of Emperor Augustus, renowned for its serene and idealized depiction of the first Roman emperor.

Beyond portraits, the collection features numerous statues depicting mythological figures, such as Hercules and Venus, as well as scenes from Roman history. These works demonstrate the Romans' deep understanding of human anatomy and their ability to convey movement and emotion through their sculptures.

Functional Art: Lamps, Pottery, and Jewelry

While the Roman Collection includes many pieces of purely decorative art, it also showcases a wide range of functional objects used in everyday Roman life. These include oil lamps, often adorned with intricate designs, as well as pottery vessels used for storage, cooking, and serving food. The collection also features a variety of jewelry, from delicate necklaces to ornate rings, reflecting the Romans' love of personal adornment.

These functional objects provide a glimpse into the daily lives of Roman citizens, from their domestic routines to their personal style. They demonstrate the Romans' attention to both form and function, creating objects that were both beautiful and practical.
